SUPREME COURT ISSUES CONTROVERSIAL DECISION IN RESPECT OF THE "MOST FAVORED NATION" CLAUSE

The Supreme Court of India has issued one of its most significant decisions on tax treaty interpretation with specific reference to Most favoured nation clauses. This decision will have far-reaching consequences on any non-resident taxpayer who has availed of the benefits of any MFN clause in any Indian tax treaty, the effect of which has not been notified explicitly by the Indian government. It is likely that these consequences will not be limited to tax claims but also interest and (potentially) penalty charges and may give rise to unrelieved double taxation. In this hotline, we take a close look at a number of controversial aspects of the Supreme Court's decision.

Recently, the Supreme Court had the occasion to interpret the Most Favored Nation ("MFN") clauses in India's tax treaties with the Netherlands<sup>1</sup>, France<sup>2</sup> and Switzerland<sup>3</sup> ("second states") in the case of Assessing Officer Circle (International Taxation) 2(2)(2) New Delhi v. M/s Nestle SA.<sup>4</sup> The MFN clause in a tax treaty obligates a particular contracting party to offer a more restrictive tax rate or restricted scope of income to the treaty partner as appears in its treaty concluded with a third state. Typically, but not necessarily, these pertain to withholding tax rates and scopes for dividends, royalties and fees for technical services.

The court was faced with questions of whether the MFN clauses contained in India's tax treaties with the Netherlands, France and Switzerland were triggered. According to the respective MFN provisions within each of these treaties, India must further restrict its withholding tax rates or limit the scope of the items of income to the extent provided in another agreement or convention concluded with an OECD member. The more restrictive rate or restricted scope may be agreed on via a new tax treaty or protocol to an existing treaty.

Slovenia, Lithuania, and Colombia ("third states") concluded their tax treaties with India before they became OECD members. The timeline of the conclusion of their treaties with India and their accession to the OECD is provided below<sup>5</sup>:

Treaty Partner	Conclusion of Treaty	Entry Into Force (in India)	OECD Accession
Slovenia	January 13, 2003	January 1, 2006	July 21, 2010
Lithuania	July 26, 2011	April 1, 2013	July 5, 2018
Colombia	May 13, 2011	April 1, 2015	April 28, 2020

It followed from the Delhi High Court decisions in Concentrix<sup>6</sup> and Nestle<sup>7</sup> that the 5% withholding tax rate would be available to Dutch, French and Swiss resident companies from July 21, 2010, if they owned at least 10% of the shares of an Indian company paying dividends. The 10% shareholding threshold would have disappeared once Colombia became an OECD member, and all dividends paid by an Indian company to Dutch, French and Swiss residents would have been eligible for the 5% withholding tax rate.

The issue in the appeal in the case of Steria<sup>8</sup> was slightly different. In this case, the France- India treaty (entry into force: 1994) provided for a wider definition of the term fees for technical services ("FTS") than did the UK-India tax treaty (entry into force: 1993). The question, therefore, was whether the MFN clause in the French treaty would require India to apply the narrower definition of the FTS provision for the purposes of the France treaty. The Delhi High Court answered this issue in the affirmative.

The challenge before the Supreme Court posed two questions. First, whether the MFN clauses were to be interpreted in a manner to allow restrictions on tax rates (Concentrix and Nestle) and scopes of income (Steria) agreed between India and third states before their accession to the OECD. Secondly, whether the benefit of the restricted rate or restricted scope would automatically be available by the virtue of the MFN clause being present as part of the treaty.

JUDGEMENT OF THE SUPREME COURT

Timing issues - Interpretation of the term "is"

Whilst the first issue pertained to three different MFN clauses in the respective treaties with the second states, the interpretational issue was limited to understanding the term "is a member of the OECD" as it appeared in each MFN clause. On this issue, the court concluded that the term “is” cannot be interpreted in a standalone manner but has to be given a meaning in the context in which it appears in the treaty. It followed that the benefit of a more restrictive tax rate or restricted scope as provided in a treaty with a third state would have been available if such a treaty is entered into with an OECD member. Therefore, the MFN clause would not allow the benefit of a restricted rate or scope appearing in India’s treaty with a third state if that third state was not a member of the OECD when concluding its treaty with India. As has been suggested in academic literature,<sup>9</sup> the court’s conclusion seems to be correct. Nevertheless, it is interesting to note that the court has not so much as referred to the rules of treaty interpretation in Articles 31 to 33 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (“VCLT”) whilst interpreting the term “is”.

Requirement to notify the effect of the MFN clause

On the second issue, the court observed that the benefit of a more restrictive tax rate or restricted scope in the treaty with a third state would be available via the MFN clause only if it were specifically notified by the central government. Therefore, a more restrictive tax rate or restricted scope of income in a treaty with a third state would not be automatically available to the second state. The court reached this conclusion by reference to Article 31(3)(b) of the VCLT. Article 31(3)(b), which is merely a part of the general rule of interpretation, requires that a subsequent practice shall be taken into account along with the context, object and purpose whilst interpreting the treaty. Such a subsequent practice must “establish the agreement of the parties regarding its interpretation”. The court observed that India has had a consistent practice of undertaking a separate notification to allow a more restrictive rate or restricted scope in treaties with third states to be availed by a second state.

CONCLUDING COMMENTS AND IMPACT ASSESSMENT

A tax treaty should be interpreted in good faith, and in light of its object and purpose. Article 31 of the VCLT provides for the general rule of interpretation. Therefore, the entirety of Article 31 ought to be applied to interpret a treaty as the various elements within the provision form part of a singular rule of interpretation. The court has looked at Article 31(3)(b) in a vacuum, rather than applying the entire rule of interpretation. This approach raises the question of whether the decision was in good faith.

The impact of this decision is wider than the timing issues that arose from the decisions of the Delhi High Court in Concentrix and Nestle. It may affect every non-resident taxpayer (and persons responsible for withholding taxes) who has so far taken advantage of any MFN clause contained in any Indian tax treaty, the effect of which has not been notified by the Indian government except to the extent such taxpayers’ assessment is barred by time. It is likely that these consequences will not be limited to retroactive tax claims. Whilst penalty charges may not be sustainable because the issues raise substantial question of law which needed adjudication by the Supreme Court, the retroactive tax claims may be expected to attract interest charges. These consequences could pose challenges to a business’s cash flows.

The Supreme Court’s decision seems to represent a unilateral interpretation of a bilateral treaty provision. This raises the additional question of whether the other contracting states will provide an additional credit to relieve the double taxation that is otherwise bound to arise.
