EXTRA-TERRITORIALITY AND TRADEMARK INFRINGEMENT: THE DELHI HIGH COURT REVISITS THE "PURPOSEFUL AVAILMENT" TEST

In a recent judgment¹, the Delhi High Court ("Court") held that:

- An Indian court can exercise jurisdiction over a defendant website located outside of India, only if it is shown that the website intentionally targets Indian customers.

FACTS

- Tata Sons Private Limited ("Plaintiff"), under its well-known brand name/trademark "TATA", appears to be providing a platform for trading in crypto-currency, though the Plaintiff itself does not deal in crypto-currency under any brand name or trade mark.
- The Defendant No.1, Hakuna Matata $Tata Founders operates the website www.tatabonus.com and is located in the United Kingdom. Defendant No.2 is located in the United States, and operates the website, www.hakunamatatafinance.com. Both the Defendants use their respective websites for the sale and purchase of cryptocurrencies, under the name "TATA Coin/$TATA". The Plaintiff instituted a suit in the Court, alleging that its trademark, "TATA", was being infringed by the Defendants, and sought an interim injunction against the Defendants to prevent them from continuing to use the "TATA" trademark on their websites.

ISSUE BEFORE THE COURT

- Whether the Court had jurisdiction over the defendants located outside India?

PLAINTIFF'S CONTENTIONS

- The Plaintiff argued that the Court can exercise extraterritorial jurisdiction over the Defendants if there is (i) purposeful availment, by the Defendant, of the jurisdiction of the court, (ii) arising of the cause of action, from the activities of the Defendant, within the jurisdiction of the court and (iii) substantial connection between the acts of the Defendant or their consequences and the jurisdiction of the court. The plaintiff relied on various precedents, including the judgment in India TV) Independent News Services Pvt. Ltd. v. India Broadcast Live LLC ("India TV"),² for making this argument.
- As per the Plaintiff, all three elements of the above test were met in this case as the Defendant had purposefully availed of the Court's jurisdiction by making their cryptocurrency available for purchase by Indian customers. For this, the Plaintiff relied on the following:
 - a. Defendants' cryptocurrency could be purchased by users in India by using the websites;
 - b. Indian users had posed questions on the Twitter page of Defendant No.1 enquiring details on purchasing their cryptocurrency from India;
 - c. Defendants' websites received 50 visits from Indian users in a day;
 - d. Defendant No.1's Telegram group had several Indian members.
- The Plaintiff also argued that the effect of the Defendant's infringing acts was felt in India, since it had resulted in dilution of the goodwill associated with the Plaintiff's registered trademarks. Since the adverse impact on the Plaintiff's business was felt in India, an Indian court could exercise its jurisdiction over the Defendant.

JUDGMENT

The Court denied the Plaintiff's plea for an interim injunction, and held:

- For the Court to exercise its jurisdiction over the Defendants, it should be proved through evidence that the Defendants intended to target Indian customers through their websites.
- In order for an Indian court to exercise jurisdiction in case of internet activities, the websites with infringing content must not only be accessible within the jurisdiction of the court, but there should be " purposeful direction of activity to the forum state in a substantial way." Where this is absent, an Indian court does not have the long arm jurisdiction to act against a non-resident.
- In the present case, there was no purposeful availment of the Court's jurisdiction by the Defendants, for the following reasons:

- a. Although cryptocurrency could be purchased by Indian users on the Defendants' websites, no specific evidence was available to show that the Defendants had specifically targeted the Indian market.
 - b. The mere fact that persons from India posted queries on the Twitter page of the Defendant No.1 is not sufficient to show purposeful availment by the Defendants. There was no evidence to show that the Defendants had responded to these queries at any time or invited Indian customers to purchase its product.
 - c. Jurisdiction of an Indian court cannot be invoked only because a website appears to get traffic from India. The Court noted that 50 users per day is a very small number of visitors on the website.
 - d. There was no evidence to show that the members of the Defendant's Telegram page were present in India, even though they had Indian names, or that they accessed the websites from India.
- A court in India will not have jurisdiction over a non-resident defendant even if it is assumed that the Plaintiff's brand is diluted in India as a result of the Defendant's act of offering services to Indian users, if the Indian users are not specifically targeted.

COMMENTS

When bringing trademark infringement actions against foreign defendants, plaintiffs should ensure that evidence is available to establish that the defendants have availed the jurisdiction of the forum court. Some evidence that may be relevant for this could be advertisements of the websites with infringing content in Indian media, specific statements made by the website operators that India is a significant market for their products/services, the facility for accepting Indian currency on the websites, etc.

If the issue pertains to use of an infringing domain name, an effective solution for trademark owners aggrieved with infringement of their trademarks through third party domain names is to pursue dispute resolution through the Uniform Domain Name Dispute Resolution Policy ("UDRP") Administrative Procedure for generic top-level domains such as .com, .net, etc.³ If the domain name is a ".in" domain, then the trademark owners can initiate action as per the .IN Domain Name Dispute Resolution Policy ("INDRP").⁴ Both, the INDRP and UDRP provide for a time-bound arbitration process for effective resolution.
